

counselling psychology

'The best thing about counselling psychology is the face-to-face client work; it's a real privilege to share in a complex process of change and deeply satisfying on a personal level. But I do so many other interesting things as well as therapy: with research, supervision and the teaching and training of others, my job is endlessly fascinating and evolving.'

Jennie Rowden, Dorset Healthcare Trust

Where do counselling psychologists work?
Health and social care, prison service, educational and academic settings, organisations (commercial and industrial), and management consultancy.

What do they do?

Provide counselling and psychotherapy, training, consultancy, research, and supervision.

How do you become a counselling psychologist?

Degree in psychology; accredited postgraduate qualification in counselling psychology.

www.bps.org.uk/careers

The British Psychological
Society