

occupational psychology

'The great thing about occupational psychology is that you are dealing with real people in important settings. There is a huge knowledge base, and occupational psychologists can often make a valuable contribution to the way we work.'

Zander Wedderburn, BPS President 2003–2004

Where do occupational psychologists work?
Private and public organisations; large and small consultancies.

What do they do?

Enhance performance of people at work and in training; increase effectiveness of the organisation or group; improve job satisfaction of the individual; organisational consultancy; vocational guidance and counselling; ergonomics; health and safety; supporting equality of opportunity; teaching; research.

How do you become an occupational psychologist?

Degree in psychology; MSc in occupational or organisational psychology; supervised practice.

www.bps.org.uk/careers

The British Psychological
Society