

teaching & research in psychology

'I love the challenge of providing a quality learning experience for a diverse body of students. The rewards for doing a good job are amazing. Academia also enables me to engage with the cutting edge of research in my field. Exploring psychology applied to everyday issues is exciting and motivating both for me and my students'

Shara Lochun, London Metropolitan University

Where do teachers and researchers in psychology work?

Universities or further education; research units; civil service; schools.

What do they do?

Teaching, research and administration.

How do you become a teacher and researcher in psychology?

Degree in psychology; Masters; PhD; professional psychology training; PGCE.